Ophthalmologic complications of tropical theileriosis. A 30-year-old boy from a rural area in Northeast India had acute onset of eye redness and watering over the left eye, necessitating medical help. Examination revealed that the left eye was inflamed with dilated pupils with no signs of anterior uveitis, either. There were a few spots on the anterior part of the iris in the inflamed eye. The patient was treated with topical ciprofloxacin 0.3% with symptomatic relief. The results of the complete blood count (CBC) and serological tests confirmed the diagnosis of tropical theileriosis. His general condition deteriorated, followed by development of skin lesions, both anteriorly and posteriorly. He had multiple erythematous, nodular lesions, with desquamation, and papular lesions, mainly on the scalp, with alopecia. These lesions subsided with symptomatic relief after treatment with doxycycline. In addition, his eyes were found to be dry, with no signs of posterior uveitis. The present invention relates to packaging material especially suitable for use in food preparation in an automatic dishwasher. The material is particularly useful for pot holders and is adapted to be attached to a dishwasher rack. The use of pot holders and the like to protect hands and wrists from the hot dishwasher water, in particular, when washing crockery which may contain broken pieces of ceramic ware, is known. Such pot holders commonly take the form of a cup-like piece of material bent to a funnel shape and made of a heat resistant plastic such as polyethylene. These pot holders are commonly placed in the dishwasher rack on the bottom and the handle is formed by a downwardly extending rib. The reason for making pot holders of this type is to avoid damaging the dishwasher, such as by dropping the pot holder into the water. The problem of pot holders is that they can only be used when the dishwasher is not in use and are generally not suitable for easily attaching to a dishwasher rack when in use, either when the dishwasher
